Thin as Tissue Paper. (Rehoboth Herald.)

The gold, 22 carats fine, is run through heavy rollers, coming out a ribbon about an inch wide and of the thickness of blotting paper. The ribbon is clipped into inch squares and placed between the leaves of a parchment book three inches square. This book is called the cutch, and contains 200 leaves. When it has been placed in a heavy parchment envelope it is given to a brawny workman. He stands before a pounding block of solid granite and with an iron hammer weighing fifteen pounds, beats the cutch until the gold within is three inches square instead of one inch. The blow struck is not the crushing blow of a butcher's ax; it must rebound lightly. The gold is next cut in quarters and placed in another book called the shoda, which contains some $50 leaves. This book consists of a peculiar substance made from the entrails of oxen. It is as fine and smooth and flexible as the lining of an eggshell. It is very costly, the price of a single book being $50. A book will stand 150 beatings, after which it is sold to manufacturers of imitation gold leaf.

The shoda is beaten with a lighter ham-(Rehoboth Herald.)

The shoda is beaten with a lighter hammer and a more expert strike. The idea is to make the leaf a little thicker on the edges than in the middle. This is in order that when the leaf is finally trimmed and sold the manufacturer and not the buyer will get the advantage of the heavier part.

Up to this time all the work is in the hands of the men. The transferring of the leaf from the shoda to the next book and the final beating has always been the work of women. A light touch and a deft hand are required to do this without breaking the leaf, which has now been beaten to the thinness of the thinnest tissue paper.

The last book is called the mold, and has 1,000 leaves. In it the gold tissue is beaten to one-fourth that delicate thickness.

The girls sit at little inclosed desks in an almost airless room. The smallest draft of wind must be excluded, so light is the substance handled. As it is, quantities fly about and settle in the girls hair and clothing. The walls and corners glisten with it. In front of each girl is a fine leather cushion, and at her side are piled the molds. She turns the leaves, and with the aid of two slender wooden tools, one a pincers and the other a kind of stiletto, lifts the shimmering gold drops it on the leather cushion and breathes on it gently to flatten it. This must all be done lightly and quickly. With two strokes of a wooden stamp, called a wagon, something like a cooky cutter, the gold is cut into a 3%-inch square. The trimmings are swept back into a box and the gold is again lifted and dropped between the leaves of a tissue paper book, where it becomes the gold leaf of commerce. Twenty of them are sold together in a package. The retail price is $7.50. An expert workman can make from sixty to eighty books a day.

They resemble placer diggings more than any other. The beeswax miner uses, a plow and team of horses to work the alluvial deposits at the mouth of the bay, and sometimes goes at it with pick and shovel. Occasionally some fine specimens of the wax are found floating or cast upon the sands of the beach.

How did the beeswax get there? Authorities differ as to this. Samples have been sent to men who claim to be mineral experts, and they say that it is probably ozocerite, otherwise known as mineral wax or natural paraffine. The paraffine made from petroleum produced from beeswax, gives a similar odor when melting, and it is easy to see that a mistake might be made. On the other hand, beeswax experts insist that it is the product of the bee, the charactertistic odor disappearing somewhat from long exposure to the elements. When found, the pieces have a corroded appearance, like mineral are, and the discoloration extends the ught the substance to some extent. This might be expected, for much of it has been tossed about by the waves or has been buried in the beach sand for two or three centuries.
